

Topic set — for review by Tripler

Prepared 2026-09-15 · 10 provisional topics · status in the system: `approved: false`

We monitor journalist-request services for questions someone at InHouse Wellness could credibly answer, so that answering them earns editorial coverage. A filter decides which requests are yours. The ten topics below were drafted by the system, not by you — you have never seen them, which is exactly why they are marked provisional and why nothing has been or can be sent from them. This asks you to fix the list: keep what is right, cut what is not, add what is missing.

What you would be approving: standing attribution on business and coaching commentary, without per-request review. When a journalist asks something inside your approved topics we may put your name forward as a source without checking first each time. You still write or approve anything actually quoted — what you waive is the approval step on whether to raise your hand at all. Your regime is experience-based: no citations are attached to your topics and none are required.

What you will never be attributed: anything clinical. A separate cited claim bank (30 claims, 47 verified citations) belongs to Dr. Timur Alptunaer, MD, and to nobody else. This is enforced in code, not by anyone remembering: `assert_clinical_attribution()` runs on every batch and halts the entire run if claim-bank vocabulary — sauna, cold plunge, blood pressure, cardiovascular, recovery — is ever routed to you. It does not warn and continue. The reason is scope of practice: a health coach quoted on cardiovascular mortality literature is a professional problem for you and a credibility problem for the company in the same sentence. "Functional health" sits right on that boundary, which is why it is worth your particular attention in the list below.

The three requests these topics matched

Every request the filter has assigned to you, quoted in full as the journalist wrote it. No pitch was sent for any of them. Each matched on the single anchor word shown — that is the whole basis on which the software decided the request was yours, so these are the real test of the list above.

1 • Thoughts That Work Podcast — matched on `solopreneurs`

We're looking for women solopreneurs to join us on the 'Thoughts that Work' podcast. You're about 2-3 years into your business, genuinely care about the work you do, experienced a few ups and downs, and would like to share the real story behind the business you've built - including the decisions, challenges, lessons, and turning points that shaped it. I'm a successful business owner who knows firsthand that doing... [truncated by the platform; remainder behind a click-through]

2 · RTMNexus — matched on founders, leadership

RTMNexus will be in Toronto from October 25–27, 2026, recording in-person video interviews for the RTMNexus leadership podcast. We are seeking senior executives and leaders from major retail and technology companies who can discuss topics such as retail transformation, commerce, artificial intelligence, emerging technology, customer experience, innovation and leadership. We are particularly interested in CEOs, founders, C-suite executives, senior vice presidents, vice presidents and other senior decision-makers from prominent companies and recognizable brands. Publicists, PR representatives, agencies, companies and executives are welcome to respond. Please include: the proposed interviewee's name, title and company; a short biography; suggested interview topics; availability in Toronto between October 25 and October 27; the best contact information for arranging the interview. These are in-person interviews in Toronto. Remote interviews are not part of this request.

3 · Business Insight — matched on founders, employees

Cybercriminals aren't standing still, and the companies protecting businesses can't afford to either. I'm interested in hearing from cybersecurity leaders who are anticipating new threats, strengthening defenses, and giving their clients greater confidence that they're prepared for whatever comes next. I'm looking to feature founders, CEOs, CISOs, and other decision-makers at cybersecurity companies that are actively helping organizations defend themselves against evolving threats. At this time, I am not accepting pitches from third parties. This includes PR companies that represent experts in the field. You: You lead a cybersecurity company with a team of at least three employees and play an active role in developing products, services, or strategies that help clients stay ahead of cybercriminals. My focus questions will include the following: Which emerging threats concern you most right now? How is your company preparing clients to defend against them? And what are you doing differently today because of the ways cybercriminals and their tactics have evolved?

Yours? Yes ☐ No ☐ Only with changes ☐

If some of those look wrong, that is the most useful thing in this document. `founders` and `employees` are generic enough to appear in a request that has nothing to do with you. The filter has been tightened once for exactly this — an earlier version promoted a story about holiday staffing at pet retailers because it contained the word "employees". Telling us which are not yours is how the anchor words get narrowed. Nothing was sent, so there is no damage to undo.

Sign-off

I approve the topics marked Keep above, as worded, for standing attribution to me on business and coaching commentary, without review of each individual request. I understand no clinical claim will ever be attributed to me, and that this is enforced in code. Topics marked Cut are removed and cannot be matched against.

Name	Date	Signature

Re-approval is required if any topic wording changes. Until this is signed the system records `approved: false` and raises no pitch from any topic above.
